Some of the best advice you can get when you start translate will be straightforward enough that there won't be much difference between the two approaches. But more often than not, paying attention to what someone is saying — not just the words the person is using — will pay off in doing a better job of conveying the idea that someone is trying to get across. When translating from one language to another, aim for conveying the meaning rather than translating individual words. Literal translations often fall short because they can fail to take into account the context and nuances of meaning. There is often no single "best" translation, so two translations of meaning. The nuances of meaning are nuances of meanin seen in the answer to a question that a reader raised via email about an article that used to appear on this site: When you're translating from one language to another, how do you decide which word listed when I looked up that word in the dictionary. The question referred to my translation of the sentence "¿La fórmula revolucionaria para obtener pestañas llamativas?" (taken from a Spanish-language Maybelline mascara ad) as "The revolucionaria para obtener pestañas llamativas?" (taken from a Spanish-language Maybelline mascara ad) as "The revolucionaria para obtener pestañas llamativas?" (taken from a Spanish-language Maybelline mascara ad) as "The revolucionaria para obtener pestañas llamativas." "bold" at least is closer in concept to the dictionary definition of what I used in my first draft: Then I used "thick," which isn't even close to any standard of llamativo. Let me explain the various philosophies of translation before discussing that particular word. In general, it can be said that there are two extreme approaches in the way one can translate from one language to another. The first is seeking a literal translation, sometimes known as formal equivalence, in which an attempt is made to translate using the words that correspond as exactly as possible in the two languages, allowing, of course, for the grammatical differences but without paying a great deal of attention to context. A second extreme is paraphrasing, sometimes called making a free or loose translation. One problem with the first approach is that literal translations can be awkward. For example, it might seem more "exact" to translate the Spanish obtener as "to obtain," but most of the time "to get" will do just as well and sounds less pretentious. An obvious problem with paraphrasing is that the translator may not accurately convey the intent of the speaker, especially where precision of language is required. So many of the best translations take a middle ground, sometimes known as dynamic equivalence — trying to convey the thoughts and intent behind the original as close as possible, veering from the literal where needed to do so. In the sentence that led to the reader's question, the adjective llamar (sometimes translated as "to call"), so broadly speaking it refers to something that calls attention to itself. Dictionaries usually provide translations such as "gaudy," "showy," "brightly colored," "flashy," and "loud" (as in a loud shirt). However, some of those translations have somewhat negative connotations — something eyelashes. My first translation was a paraphrase; mascara is designed to make eyelashes appear thicker and therefore more noticeable, so I went with "thick." After all, in English that's a common way to describe the kind of eyelashes that Maybelline customers would want. But upon reflection, that translation seemed inadequate. This mascara, another part of the ad pointed out, not only makes the eyelashes look thicker, but also longer and exageradas or "exaggerated." I considered alternative ways of expressing llamativas, but "attractive" seemed to convey the thought behind the Spanish word in this context but didn't seem quite right for an ad. So I went with "bold." It seemed to me to do a good job of stating the purpose of the product and is also a short word with a positive connotation that might have tried "What's the secret to having eyelashes people will notice?") A different translator very well might have used a different word, and there very well could be words that would work better. In fact, another reader suggested "striking" — a great choice. But translation is often more art than science, and that can involve judgment and creativity at least as much as it does knowing the "right" words.
